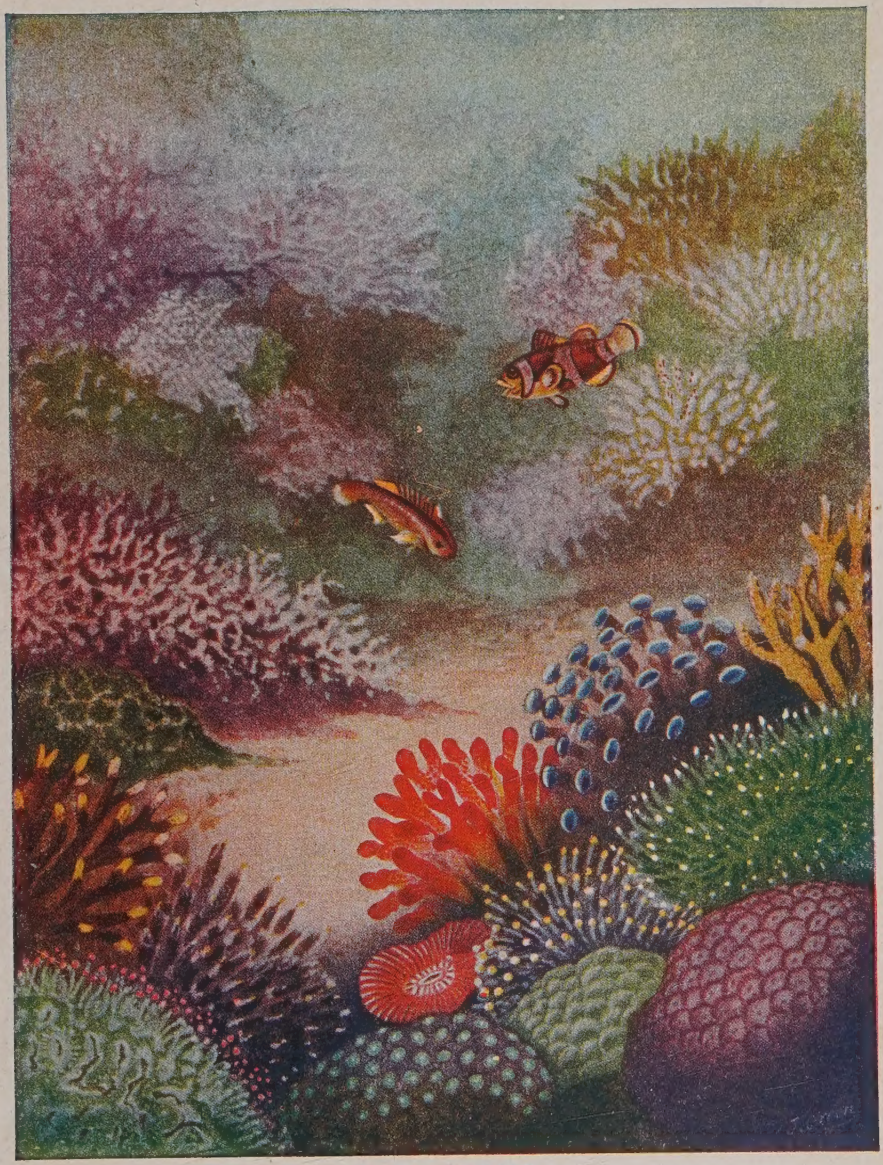
SELF-PRONOUNCING

ANEMONES OF THE SOUTHERN SEAS

The Anemones of the Northern and extreme Southern Seas, are animals of elegant form and brightness of coloring, but in richness and vividness of color they are far excelled by their relatives of warmer seas, of which a representative group is shown above.

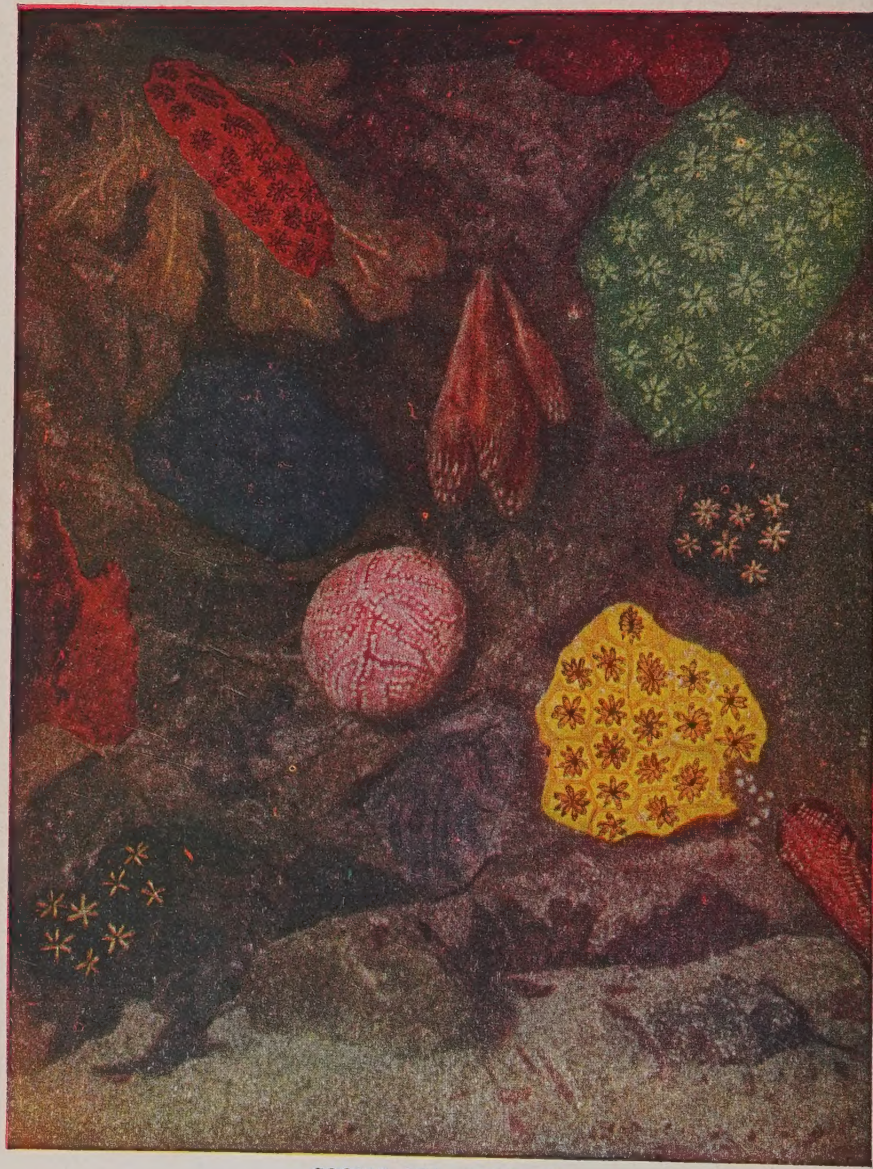
WATER-MITES

A few of the brilliant living atoms of pond life are pictured above. These Mites are Hydrachnidae, or fresh water Mites while the Marine Mites are called Halacaridae.



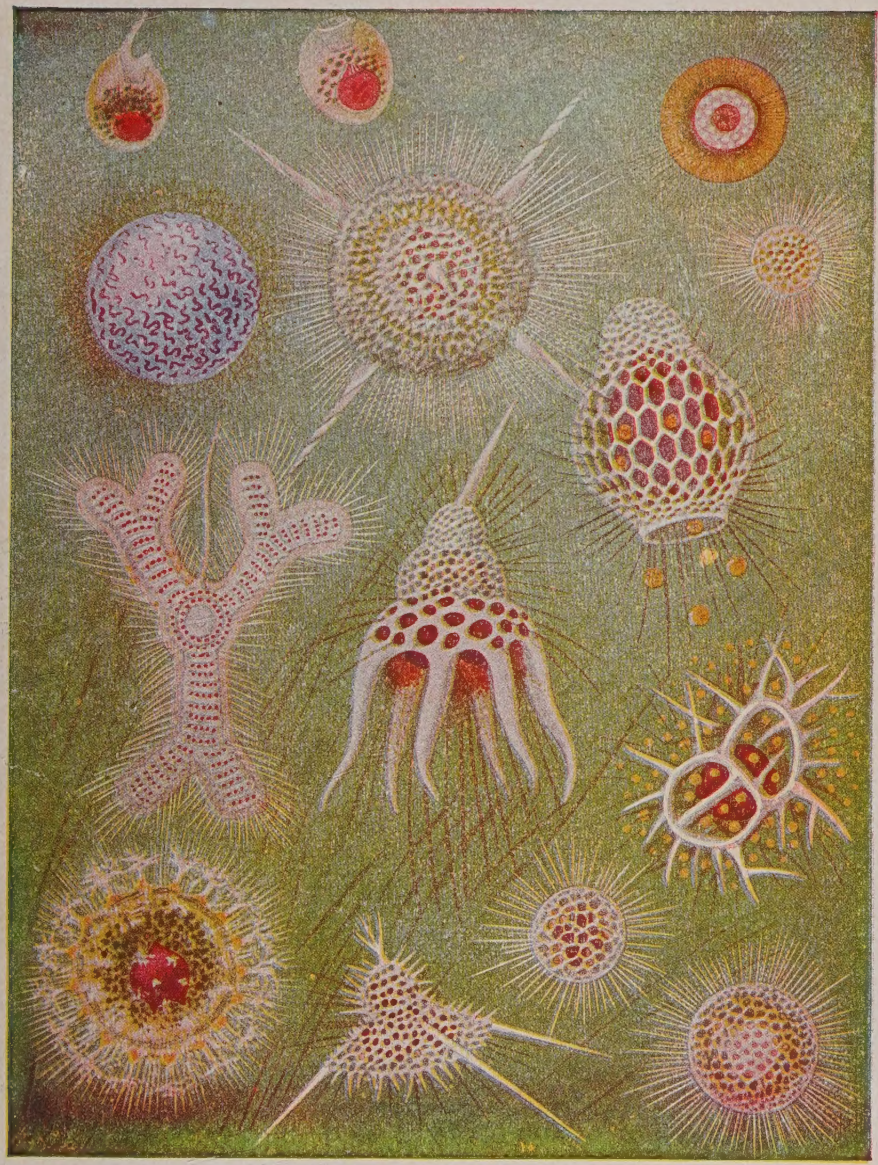
LIVING CORALS

The bleached skeletons of Corals, as seen in our museums, afford but a slight clue to the beauty displayed when these same Corals are covered by the living polyps which build up these stony structures. An attempt is here made, in a small space, to show something of the brilliance and variety seen upon the living reef.



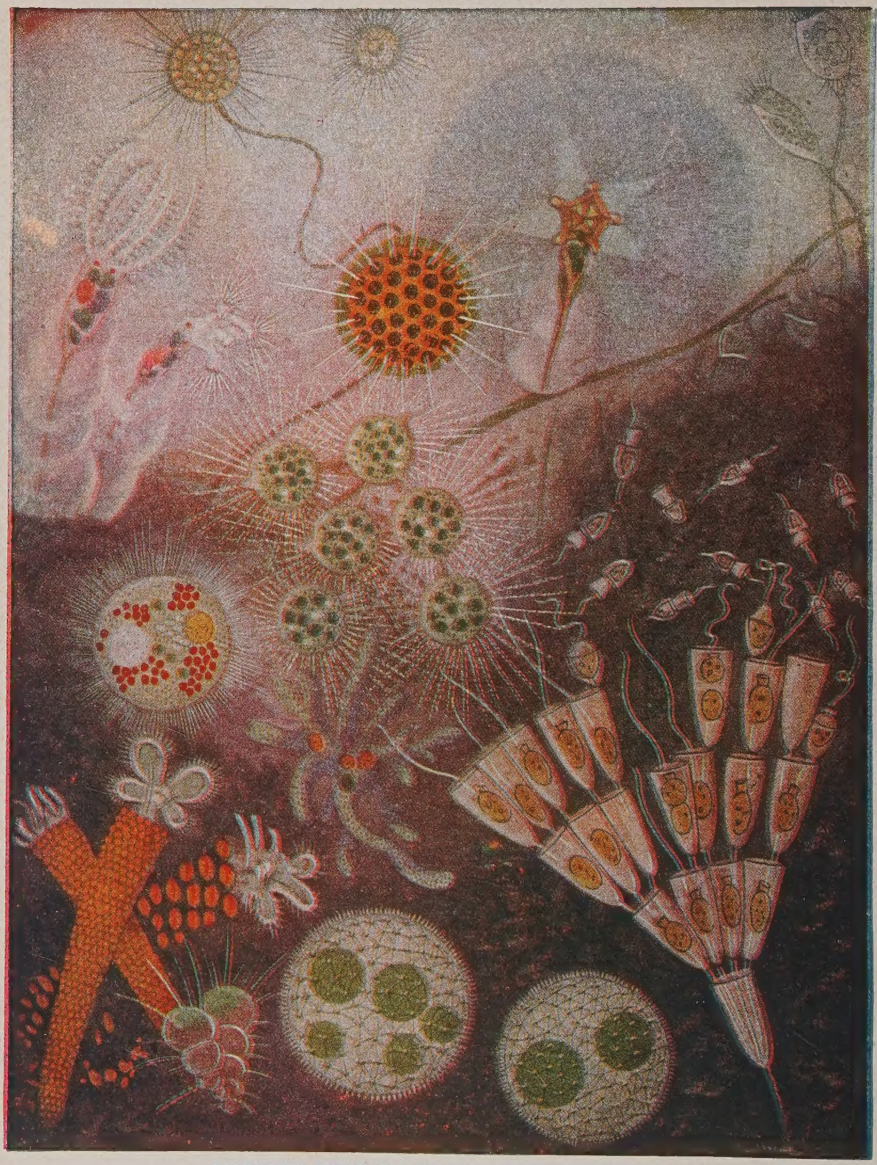
SOCIAL SEA - SQUIRTS

Among the common, though little noticed objects of the sea-shore, are many strange creatures known as Ascidians or Sea-Squirts. The structure and history of these curious aminals are most interesting. The Starry Botryllus spread their patterned jellies on rock and seaweed. Morchellium hangs like an Indian club from the rocks, and Fragrarium is not unlike a straw-berry.



RADIOLARIA

Radiolaria are living creatures, ranging in diameter from the tenth to the one hundred and fiftieth part of an inch, of complicated structure, though they are classed among the lowest forms of life. Nearly all Radiolaria are capable of emitting a phosphorescent glow. The tiny spheres shown in the body of the creatures serve as stores for nutriment and water chambers for locomotive purposes, and are as well luminous organs The radiating feelers attract food particles.



MINUTE LIFE IN PONDS AND STREAMS

In this picture are shown some of the many creatures of wonderful and beautiful forms whose existence is revealed to us by the microscope. Some are animals, some plants; others again are so puzzling in their nature that at one stage of existence they exhibit the characters of the plant and at another those of the animal They have been drawn in the natural colors under differing scales of magnification, ranging between 200 and 300 times their actual sizes.

BEAUTIFUL WORMS OF THE SEA

The sea produces an enormous number of beautiful and varied forms of worms that live among seaweeds, in rock-crevices, in deserted shells, and in sand or mud. The Nereis that occupies the right side of the plate, and the Sea Mouse in the lower left-hand corner, are highly iridescent, and exhibit all the hues of the spectrum from their scales and bristles as they glide. Cirratulus, just above the Sea Mouse, can make all its cinnabar-colored feelers glow with phosphorescent light.

THE LATTICE FUNGUS AND ORANGE ELF-CUP

The Lattice Fungus is one of the most remarkable forms of plant life. At one stage of its existence it is not unlike a puff-ball, later it is covered with an olive slime which thins away. The fungus gives off a most offensive odor. The Orange Elf-Cup in the lower half of the picture is a beautiful wax-like fungus that may sometimes be found in large numbers on woodland banks. Both forms are shown of the natural size.

INTRODUCTION

THIS Dictionary, as its title implies, is new, right up to date, equipped with the latest words in the language, words which have come into standard currency even as the printing forms are being sent to press. It will be seen, then, that numerous words and terms are to be found herein which are not incorporated in any other volume of its kind in the language.

Every word, every term in this Dictionary is standard; that is, classic, or, in other words, adapted for use by the best speakers and writers. None other has been admitted, consequently the work will commend itself to not only those who want to keep abreast of the times, but to all who wish to have a thorough working knowledge of the language in which they are constrained to express their thoughts, ideas, and requirements. This is the language spoken today by almost 200,000,000 of the human race. It is believed that it is destined to become the universal language of mankind, as it is spreading to the uttermost corners of the earth and even supplanting other tongues in their native strongholds.

The principal feature of a Dictionary is the vocabulary, therefore, in order to increase the vocabulary of the present work all irrelevant matter has been suppressed. The saving of this space in the vocabulary is utilized to far better advantage in the addition of a large number of words which are of necessity excluded from other dictionaries of this character. The average Dictionary users, particularly busy people, are much more concerned with the meanings and pronunciations of words and these they can discover at a glance in this dictionary.

The definitions are couched in concise terms, and, in the case of scientific and abstruse words, simplified so that all can fully understand them, while the pronunciations are arranged phonetically. This part of the work was entrusted to an acknowledged master of the English language of long and widely extended experience in the fields of both philology and science.

The Supplementary Dictionaries will be found to cover their branches of knowledge in a way to appeal to all classes. They have been prepared by experts in the subjects with which they deal. In addition to Sports, Games, and Amusements, almost every domain of human activity has been explored in gathering the words and terms used in these sections. The strides of modern progress, the latest achievements of science, the most recent triumphs of human ingenuity in the conquest of earth, air and water to the subservience and use of man, have been fully covered insofar as words and their meanings are concerned.

Radio has been given the attention its importance, its potentialities, and its possibilities demand, with clear and succinct definitions of the principal terms it has called into our everyday language. Unlike some other Radio sections, words pertaining strictly to electrical equipment and having nothing whatever to do with Radio have no place in the present compilation which is designed to be exclusively a Radio section, and only those words and terms belonging to Radio are included, making this section more useful to those who consult it.

In other Departments of this book will be found educational information on many and varied matters which will supply what has been wanted by the public for a long time, but heretofore has been lacking from such works as the present. On the whole, this Dictionary becomes an everyday reference work of universal instruction, presenting the sum-total of Dictionary knowledge in a nutshell, as it were.

* * * * *

The Orthography of this Dictionary is in conformity with the best modern usage in both the United States and England. American spelling is now almost identical with British, only a small number of words varying, as color (colour), center (centre), traveler (traveller), and in the case of these the leading authorities in the two countries have endorsed either form as correct.

As to the Orthoepy, the phonetic method of pronunciation is used throughout the vocabulary. Monosyllables present no difficulty, being phonetic in themselves, requiring only the diacritical symbols to indicate the quantity of the vowels. To pronounce polysyllables correctly they must be rightly divided into their component parts (syllables), therefore, correct syllabification, to a great extent, solves the problem of pronunciation.

The syllable division in this book is indicated by well-defined hyphen (-) marks, except between the accented syllable and the following one, where the accent is used instead of the hyphen. The accented or stressed syllable is clearly denoted by the primary or acute accent mark (′) impressed at the top right of the final letter of the syllable. For obvious reasons, secondary accents are not noted. The vowel quantity, except where it is unmarked, is shown by various diacritical symbols. The macron (¯) placed above a vowel means that it is long. Two dots above the vowel ä indicate that it has the long, open sound, as in ärm; this is known as open-throat a and, sometimes, as Italian a. The symbol (¨) also denotes the dieresis which, over any vowel, indicates that it is to be pronounced in a separate syllable, as zoölogy. The diacritic (°) marks the sound intermediate between short a and open-throat a. The circumflex (ˆ) over ô gives to that vowel the short sound of the letter, as in lôrd. The other circumflex (˜) over e indicates that it is neutral, unaccented before r, or has the short i, o, or u sound, as in bird (bẽrd), word (wẽrd) turn (tẽrn).

The phonetic key to pronunciation will be found on page 8.

SPECIAL DICTIONARY SECTIONS

AMONG the many exclusive features in this new Dictionary are numerous carefully prepared supplementary Dictionaries for the everyday use of everybody. While naturally the enlarged vocabulary includes a number of the many words contained in these supplementary sections, it was found to be much more convenient for Dictionary users to be able to at once turn to the particular section in which all of the desired words are grouped in alphabetical order for instant reference.

Another exclusive and useful feature in this volume is the Dictionary of Everyday Errors to be found in one of the Supplementary sections. As the title implies, this special feature comprises practically all of the errors which one is likely to hear at any time—errors of grammar, mispronunciations—mistakes so commonly found in writing and speaking. This section is designed to enable the users to correct such errors It is not to be supposed that anybody wishes to continue in error either in speaking or writing; and one easily may correct such mistakes through following out the principles laid down in this useful section.

How to spell, how to punctuate, how to capitalize, and how to build words into sentences are all set forth in this Dictionary. These special sections will be found under the titles Practical Syntax, Etymology, etc. They were contributed by some of the foremost authorities from the leading institutions of learning. This educational collection also is an exclusive feature of this useful Dictionary.

Taking it all in all, no similar Dictionary contains so many educational helps—such an interesting variety of special feature sections—and all users will agree that beyond question it is indeed THE DICTIONARY OF DICTIONARIES.

EDUCATIONAL HELPS

STANDARD ENGLISH

By Prof. Percy W. Long, Ph.D., formerly Department of English, Harvard University; Secretary of the American Dialect Society. This section covers the interesting growth and development of our language.

PRACTICAL SYNTAX

By Prof. Forrest S. Lunt, M.A., Instructor of English, Horace Mann School, Teachers College, Columbia University. Illustrates the building of words into sentences, taking up the parts of speech and their relations to each other.

ETYMOLOGY

By Prof. Clark S. Northup, Ph.D., Department of English Cornell University. Takes up and discusses the sources of our vocabulary, defining the elements of words, and showing the changes and their forms and meanings.

PUNCTUATION

By Prof. Morris W. Croll, Ph.D., Department of English, Princeton University. Shows how easy and simple it is to punctuate properly, giving examples for the use of each of the punctuation marks.

THE EVOLUTION OF ENGLISH DICTIONARIES

By Prof. John C. Rolfe, Ph.D., Department of Latin, University of Pennsylvania. This section covers the history of dictionaries from the early days of book making.

CAPITALIZATION

By Prof. Morris W. Croll, Ph.D., Department of English, Princeton University. Showing how and where to use capital letters, and giving examples for their use.

DICTIONARY OF EVERYDAY ERRORS

By Farquson Johnson, Consulting Editor of the New Universities Dictionary, and Author of Uses and Abuses of Our American Language. Includes errors of grammar, spelling, pronunciation, and the wrong use of words and terms so commonly heard and seen in speaking and writing, and shows how all such errors can be corrected.

PHONETIC KEY TO PRONUNCIATION

a, short, as in am, band, cap; short o, as in wash; aw, as in halt.
ā, long, as in ale, cane, day.
å, medium, as in ask, dance, path.
ä, open, as in arm, father, palm.
e, short, as in bread, end, met.
ē, long, as in be, fear, here.
ẽ, unaccented before r, as in baker, gather, songster; for short i, as in bird; short o, as in word; short u, as in turn.
i, short, as in fin, kid, pit.
ī, long, as in bight, fine, white.
o, short, as in bob, chop, hot; oo, as in woman; o͝o͝, as in do; short u, as in dragon and words ending in -tion.
ô, short, as in organ, border, horse.
ō, long, as in bone, home, pole.

g, hard, as in begin.
th, voiceless, as in thin
th, voiced, as in sheathe.
x, ks, as in fix; gs, as in example; z, as in xylography.

Note—As regards compound words and terms connected by a hyphen, no arbitrary rule can be formulated, or any dogmatic principle laid down for guidance; however, the modern tendency is to omit the hyphen, if it is possible to do so without affecting the meaning. The separate or two word form is preferred to the hyphen when there is no shade of difference in meaning, whether the words are connected or separate. On the other hand, many good authorities prefer to consolidate a hyphened compound when its appearance as a whole, in either script or print, is not likely to confuse the eye.

electrician (-trish'un), n. one who is skilled in the science of electricity; the maker or vendor of electrical appliances.

electricity (-tris'i-ti), n. an imponderable and invisible agent producing light, heat, chemical decomposition, and other physical phenomena; the science of the laws and phenomena which characterize electricity.

electric light (līt), light produced by electrical energy.

electrifiable ('tri-fī-å-bl), adj. capable of receiving, being charged with, or transmitting, electricity.

electrification (-fi-kā'shun), n. the act of electrifying; the state of being electrified.

electrify ('tri-fī), v.t. to charge with, or act upon, by electricity; pass an electric current through; arouse or excite suddenly.

electro–, a combining form denoting electric.

electrobiology (-bī-ol'ō-ji), n. the science which treats of the electrical phenomena of living organisms.

electrocautery (-kaw'tēr-i), n. cauterizing by a platinum wire heated by electricity.

electroculture (-kul'tūr), n. the use of electric light to promote the growth of plants.

electrocute ('trō-kūt), v.t. to put to death (a criminal) by an electric current.

electrocution (-kū'shun), n. the act of electrocuting.

electrode (e-lek'trōd), n. either of the terminals of an electric source; anode or cathode.

electrodynamics (-dī-nam'iks), n. that branch of physics which treats of electric currents.

electrodynamometer (-nå-mom'e-tēr), n. an instrument for measuring the strength of an electric current.

electrogram (ē-lek'trō-gram), n. in meteorology, a diagram showing the electric conditions of the atmosphere.

electrograph (-gråf), n. an apparatus used in preparing copper cylinders for printing fabrics and wall-papers; the photograph of an electric spark; an image made by X-rays; a sciagraph; a cinemotograph in which an arc light is used.

electrokinetics (-ki-net'iks), n. that branch of electrical science which treats of electric currents, or electricity in motion, as distinguished from electrostatics.

electrolier (-trō-lēr'), n. an ornamental metal bracket for supporting electric lamps.

electrolysis (-trol'i-sis), n. the decomposition of a chemical compound by electricity into its component parts.

electrolyte (-trō-līt), n. a chemical compound decomposable by a current of electricity.

electrolyze ('trō-līz), v.t. to decompose by the direct action of electricity or galvanism.

electro-magnet (-mag'net), n. a coil of soft iron rendered magnetic by the passage of an electric current through it.

electromagnetics (-mag-net'iks), n. the science of electromagnetism. electromagnetism (-izm), n. the science which deals with the relations between electricity and magnetism and the phenomena resulting from such relations.

electromassage (-mas-āj'), n. massage with the application of an electric current.

electrometallurgy (-met'ål-ēr-ji), n. the art of precipitating certain metals from their solutions, or of separating metals from their ores, etc., by a slow electric current.

electrometer (-trom'e-tēr), n. an instrument for measuring the amount of electrical force.

electromobile (ē-lek-trō-mō'bil), n. an automobile driven by electric storage-batteries.

electromotor (-mō'tĕr), n. any arrangement, or apparatus, which produces or excites an electric current; a dynamo.

electron (e-lek'tron), n. an electrical unit; a component of the hydrogen atom, estimated as 1/1700 of its mass: the smallest known particle.

electronegative (-neg'ă-tiv), adj. having a tendency to pass to the positive pole in electrolysis.

electropathy (-trop'ă-thi), n. the treatment of diseases by electricity.

electrophone (-fōn), n. an instrument for producing resonant sounds by electric currents; a form of telephonic transmitter.

electrophorus (-trof'ō-rus), n. an instrument for generating statical electricity by induction.

electrophotometer (-fō-tom'e-tĕr), n. an instrument for comparing the brightness of various lights with that produced by an electric spark.

electrophotomicrography (-fō-tō-mi-krog'ră-fi), n. photographing by electric light objects magnified by the microscope.

electrophysiology (-fiz-i-ol'ō-ji), n. that branch of electricity which investigates the electric phenomena of living organisms.

electroplate ('trō-plāt), v.t. to cover or give a coating of metal to by means of a current of electricity: n. an article thus coated; generally applied to silver plate.

electropositive (-poz'i-tiv), adj. tending to pass to the negative pole in electrolysis.

electroscope (-skōp), n. an electrometer.

electrostatics (-stat'iks), n. the science which treats of the phenomena of electricity at rest.

electrotechnics (-tek'niks), n. the science of the processes or methods in which electrocity is applied to the industrial arts.

electrotechnology (-nol'ō-ji), n. the science which deals with the practical applications of electricity.

electrothermal (-thĕr'mal), adj. combining heat and electricity; pertaining to the generation of heat by electricity.

electrotinting (-tint'ing), n. a method of producing a design, etc., in relief on a metal plate, the lines of which when exposed in an electrobath are protected by an agent.

electrotype ('trō-tīp), n. a facsimile in metal of any object made by covering a mold, plate, etc., with a coating of copper by the action of a galvanic electric current: v.t. to take a copy of by electrical deposition.

electrum ('trum), n. German silver plate.

electuary (-lek'tū-ă-ri), n. a purgative composed of powders and fruit preserves.

eleemosynary (el-ē-mos'i-nā-ri), adj. pertaining to alms; devoted to charitable purposes; dependent upon charity: n. one who lives on alms.
